Christian Schad was the first early 20th-century modernist to rediscover and work with the photogram. An image made without a camera by placing an object directly on photosensitive paper and exposing the paper to light, the photogram had been known since photography's beginnings but was newly explored by the avant-garde for the abstract, formal possibilities it afforded.

Photography was an excellent form of expression for the modernizing society of the twentieth century. Avant-garde artists embraced the medium as the ideal way to defy visual statements. Photography offered the possibility of an objective visual mode with which to contrast the subjective psychological intensity of expressionism.
